I really liked when he said that instead of experiencing something, he wanted to make something. I think a lot of people forget that being part of something generally feels much more fulfilling. Getting credit for being part of something amazing is amazing, for lack of a better term. Part of the human condition, I think, is to want to leave that impact. This comes up in what this is titled after, 'Childhood Dreams'. As a kid, we had these big dreams of going to the moon, discovering something, becoming president. To leave an impact. This is one of the things that unfortunately gets lost, most of the time, in adulthood as we go to office jobs and become part of the system. I loved that part of his message because it really resonated with that part of me, because when I was a kid and when I looked up at dinosaur fossils, it made me want to be a paleontologist. I wanted to be one of those people that found those, I didn't want to be one of the people who simply viewed it
